Speech delivered
by J. Davis
at Troy

Gentlemen, Jacksonian, & Sellers of this Conflicting Community
Your honors sit high, on the seat of justice, like the American Eagle, perched on the Asiatic, rocks of Gibraltar, while the Streams of justice, like the Cadachian, clouds of the valley, roll meandering, at your democratic feet. Therefore I call upon you to exaggerate yourselves, exaggerate! yourselves I say, and support the insufficiency of the Oracle of Jackson

While Buonaparte are marching his army from Elbe to Paris, and from Paris to Elbe, I stand here, before you, as a notorious Advocate, of this Jacksonian administration.
The Cattle may feed upon the mountains below, and the Sheep may graze, upon the valleys, above, but General Andrew Jackson, are no more guilty of vetoing, the exonerations excommunicativeness, of the voloniousness, of the United States Bank, than a toad, are got a tail. No Sir, see. It was the circumlocution of the Henry Clay party, and when General Jackson had spificated the confidence of Congress, he rose high in his supercilious Majesty, and crushed the growing powers, of these illisible States.

Gentlemen, I consider this adequate to the circumferenced of Jacksonism, and I now provice you to exaggerate yourselves - I sit down with spaths -

The Speech as given above, is said to have been spoken, by learned Sellers in 1834
